Develop Morals

A society establishes a set of morals to live by, for instance, it is wrong to steal, it is wrong to kill or maim, et cetera. Although many are common to most world versions, some difference occurs. These small differences in societal sets of morals are often the cause of wars. Many people claim that religion is the cause of most wars, but usually, it is a difference between the morals resulting from those religions. When entering a situation of conflict, understanding that the person/people you are dealing with has a different set of morals than you is crucial to tolerance, acceptance, and forgiveness.
Joseph Kaluza

Hand in hand with ethics, morals cover everything! It involves the littlest things, from what you personally want to believe in and when you will or will not participate in activities. Morals are what you believe in and stand by all your life. Most times some of our morals have been instilled in us by our parents, or influential figures in our lives. Strong morals show responsibility and indicate a conscience that are positive things to have in a world such as ours!
Melanie Coulas

MORALS are the principles by which you live your life. Having high morals means you do what is right. For me, this means that I evaluate what I believe to be right and what I believe to be wrong, and then I do what I feel is right. It means you don't break the law and you accept responsibility for your actions.
Elizabeth Linsley

Morals are your concept of right and wrong and whether you care if you choose to do right or not. Most people have a moral conscience which shows that they choose to be a good person. if you have morals, you do the right thing usually. Morals are needed in order to be a good person.
Lilly Field

Your Morals are like the ground that your ethical Garden grows in. They are general little rules about the way you live your life. You can't develop ethics without developing Morals. Your morals are what you look to when you want to know how to approach something. They mark out where all your little ethics grow. They develop as the ground work with your ethics and become richer and more valuable time goes by. Your morals are what enable you to say no thank you, or walk away whenever you are tempted by alcohol, drugs, gambling and violence...
Melissa Brooks

Form the time you are born, you begin learning morals. Morals are principles that deal with right and wrong. Morality is important to society. It begins with the individual. If everyone had strong morals and followed them, the world would be a much more peaceful place. The important thing to remember is that it is not enough just to have morals. A famous quote states that, "If you are not part of the solution, you are part of the problem." Morality means that you not only know the difference (between right and wrong) and practice it yourself, but that you encourage others to practice morals. Morality is easily spread and just needs to be brought to the forefront of our thoughts.

The term morals describes behavior. It is the difference between right and wrong. This concept however is good/bad as societal standards vs. values (see term values). A person who does not murder because it is wrong is acting under the belief of society, which preaches this belief (a good one I might add). If a country goes to war or a person fights a holy battle in the "name of God" I would venture to say it is still murder. These people are not seen as immoral because they are acting within what society accepts. This concept is different from values which are individual.
